The WAM Active (ASX: WAA) investment portfolio increased during the month. Western Australian copper-gold explorer Solstice Minerals (ASX: SLS) and Australian lithium developer Core Lithium (ASX: CXO) were key contributors to the investment portfolio performance.

Solstice Minerals is advancing the Nanadie Copper-Gold Project (Nanadie) near Meekatharra in Western Australia. In April, the company released visual results from deeper drilling below earlier high-grade copper hits. These results suggest the mineral system extends well below the current resource, highlighting the deposit's potential scale. In the near term, we see share price upside as drilling helps define a larger resource, while laboratory results confirming grade and continuity build confidence in a pathway towards an approximate 250 million tonne deposit. This suggests the company is undervalued relative to its peers on comparable multiples. We remain bullish on copper, supported by energy transition and electrification themes.

Core Lithium owns 100% of the Finniss Lithium Project (Finniss) in the Northern Territory, and has exploration exposure across the Northern Territory and South Australia in base metals, rare earths and gold. The share price rallied in April on two supportive developments. First, a 20,000 tonne sale of fine-particle ore ready for shipment to Glencore International AG's trading arm at approximately $405 per tonne, together with the earlier sale from its lithium concentrate stockpile, generating approximately $18 million to support the Finniss restart. While the transactions were modest in dollar value, they suggested demand and sentiment had improved enough to support a restart. Broader optimism across the lithium sector also strengthened during the month as supply discipline took hold and lithium prices increased. We remain bullish on lithium, supported by strong demand from battery energy storage systems and electric vehicles, with battery lithium intensity growing at more than 30% per annum. Core Lithium offers strong exposure to a recovery in lithium prices as it works towards a relatively low-risk restart in the second half of 2026, and we expect the supply response to be more disciplined this cycle.
